Deconstructing Bias (Due April 13): (25 points)

This project requires students to examine the prejudices, biases, and stereotypes they hold about a particular community or group. After determining where personal biases, prejudices, or stereotypes may lie, students will observe activity of this group or community in an online or in-person setting and write a personal reflection paper, critically examining their experience. A portion of this paper should be autobiographical to the goal of seeing yourself as a raced/classed/gendered/abled etc. individual. The details in this section should provide a rich description of the ways in which interactions and experiences helped to shape the candidate as an individual. Papers should be 5-7 pages and include citations from our class readings or digital sources.

Questions to consider:

- How will you thoughtfully connect with this group?
 - What do you need to consider for your own safety and well-being?
- What current myths/assumptions exist about this group?
 - What does it mean to you to engage with this group when you have such assumptions?
 - What does it mean to engage with this group in your current or future work setting (classroom, clinic, etc.)?
- What assets (funds of knowledge) did you observe?
 - What can you learn from this group?
- What did you learn from this observation and reflection that will inform your future work?
